FLASHY COLORS MAY RUN

Clothing Treated With American Dyes May Not Withstand Attacks of Jupiter Pluvius. When you buy that new autumn suit a week or so from now be sure to choose one that is plain in color. If you don't you may resemble a zebra after the first moisture collects on the cloth.

Officials of the National Association of Clothiers say that it will be a very short time, indeed, before the lack of coal tar dyestuffs will necessitate keeping the clothe colored in American dyes away from the elements.

German dyes, of course, are shut out by the war, and the American dyemakers are, according to clothiers, not making the coloring matter up to the standard of the Teutons.

You may be able to enjoy your new outfit for as long as two or three weeks. Then you will have to get with the first rain in the coat will wrinkle and the coloring will begin to run in a way that would make Ted Meredith literally green with envy. The bright checks and the flashy sweeds will assume a sorry-looking appearance, and you will go home bedraggled.

The trade in heavy Palm Beach suits and other white suitings has been growing brisker and brisker since William R. Corwin, secretary of the National Association of Clothiers, made the following announcement:

"It will not be long before the lack of coal-tar dyestuffs will be called to the attention of every man, woman and child in the United States. The people must be patient, and if only plain colors are obtainable, and the people do not stand exposure to weather the manufacturer must not be blamed.

"We can make coal-tar dyes in this country, but there is no fear that after the war the huge supply given by the Government of Germany to maintain the dye industry there would crush out competition here."
